

We believe that community archaeology is archaeological research carried out by, and for, local communities, either with or without the support of professionals. We strongly believe that archaeology can involve everyone irrespective of experience, skills, knowledge, education or social background. We also believe that well designed community projects can reach far beyond local interest and can address important academic questions. We aim to empower and equip community groups with the skills and facilities to make significant contributions to the archaeological record.

We now have a dedicated Community Archaeology Hub where you can find information about the services we offer.

We have also published the Meerstone Community Archaeology Manual to bring together all our methodologies in a unique open content document. Click here for further information.
